Conservation photographer Steven David Johnson is drawn to the intricate dance of underwater life in Appalachian Mountain forests and nearby lowlands. Often overlooked because of their small size and nocturnal nature, vernal pool animals have complex lifecycles that involve an aquatic element. From the abstract patterns of spotted salamander egg masses to the golden filigree of a wood frog tadpole, there is a tiny world of beauty and complexity that deserves notice and protection.